

Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Act 2006
Barring Consultation Document

Response from The Lilith Project in Conjunction with the London
Sexual Violence Action and Awareness Network

The Lilith Project was established at the beginning of 2003 as a pan-London, second tier, violence against women (VAW) agency managed by Eaves Housing for Women. The Project's remit is to raise awareness of VAW, capacity build within the VAW sector, lobby Government, share best practice and develop as a centre of expertise around VAW issues.

Lilith has a well developed track record of highlighting issues of VAW with action-oriented outcomes that enable agencies and individuals to challenge harmful practices. The project has produced research reports on issues such as lap dancing, and will shortly release reports on women's homelessness and rape convictions. Lilith facilitates the London Sexual Violence Action and Awareness Network (SVAAN), and the Kalabash Forum.

This response has been formulated in conjunction with SVAAN, which comprises a range of agencies who support survivors of sexual violence. The expertise of these organisations in addressing both the complex needs of survivors and campaigning for policy and legislative change is key to the recommendations made in this response.

Q1. Should the period in which representations should be submitted by individuals to the Independent Safeguarding Authority be set at 8 weeks?

Eaves has no strong opinions on the timeframe which should be set.

Q2. Should the new scheme differentiate between young people and adults for the purposes of the minimum no-review period?

Yes, Eaves believe that, as with sentencing guidelines, minimum no-review periods should reflect the seriousness of the offence and the culpability of the offender including those who are less culpable, e.g. on the grounds of immaturity or learning difficulties.

Q3. Should the new scheme adopt the same minimum no-review periods as current schemes: 10 years for adults and 5 years for younger people?

No, Eaves believe the new scheme should not adopt the same minimum no-review periods, and that the concept of set 'no-review' periods is flawed. Eaves feel no-review periods should be decided on a case by case basis, supported by a set of guidelines similar to those used for sentencing sexual offences.

The sentencing guidelines for sexual offences offer a guideline sentence for each offence, with mitigating and aggravating factors which can alter that sentence. If a minimum no-review period is based upon the amount of time it would require for someone to make a considerable change in their lifestyle then this length of time will depend upon who they are, the kind of offences they are committing, how deeply entrenched their offending is, and in some cases their modus operandi.

For example a person convicted of the mercy killing of an ill relative may not require the same no-review period as a man who kills a member of his family in a planned honour killing. A man convicted of murdering his partner in a domestic violence situation might require a very different 'no review' period (if he should be offered a review at all) to a woman who kills her partner after years of abuse.

Minimum no review periods could be given by judges at the point of sentencing, or set with the support of MAPPA teams at the point of parole. In the case of men barred through cautions or other evidence the minimum no-review period could be decided by the Barring board.

Q4. Under the current schemes, the age boundary for the purpose of the minimum no-review period is 18. Should it remain at 18 or should it be raised to 25?

Eaves strongly feel that the age boundary should remain at 18, when children become legally responsible for their actions.

Anecdotal information about domestic violence perpetrators has indicated that the opposite of the consultation's assertions is true in some situations; older men who have committed acts of domestic violence are more likely to change than younger men as they begin to recognise the consequences of their behaviour as damaging to themselves as well as others.

However, it should be noted that people with learning difficulties often mature later and this should be reflected in any minimum no-review period set.

Q5: Do you agree with the list of offences that would result in automatic barring from working with children?

Please see below, questions 5 and 6 are answered together.

Q6: Do you agree with the list of offences that would result in automatic barring from working with vulnerable adults?

Eaves and SVAAN disagree with the lists of offences that would result in automatic barring from working with children or vulnerable adults, and disagree with the use of dual lists as opposed to a single register.

Problems with a dual register

Recommendation 19 of the Bichard Inquiry Report called for a 'register' in the singular. Eaves and SVAAN echo this recommendation and call for a single register of individuals who are not suitable to work with children or adults who are in vulnerable situations. The content we would recommend for these lists is included as Appendix lists 11 and 12.

To assume that a perpetrator of rape against an adult will not be 'attracted' to a child and is no danger is factually inaccurate, and will place vulnerable adults and children at risk. A collation of research carried out by the Child and Women Abuse Studies Unit (2007) has shown that the vast majority of abusers have perpetrated offences across age ranges.

- In a survey of 1,345 adult male sexual offenders almost a quarter had offended across victim groups on age, gender or relationship factors and these offenders were assessed as significantly riskier (Cann, Friendship & Gozna, 2006).
- A survey of 223 incarcerated adult sexual offenders carried out in the USA found that 52% of inmates who were known to carry out sexual offences against adults admitted to sexually abusing children, and 78% of inmates who were known to sexually abuse children also admitted to sexually offending against adults (Heil, Ahlmyer & Simons, 2003).
- A study looking at self reports by 99 men convicted of sexual offences found that 12% of child abusers admitted to also attempting forced sex on an adult female. 34% of extrafamilial child abusers also committed incest. 50% of intrafamilial child abusers offended outside the home (Weinrott & Saylor, 1991 cited Barnes, A.R. et al, 1994).

Other research supports these findings:

- The National Children's Home Action for Children study (2002) found that children of women experiencing domestic violence frequently experienced direct physical and sexual assault (cited in Mullender, 2004).
- The case which prompted the Bichard Inquiry and led to recommendation 19 and the creation of the Barring Board involved Ian Huntley, a man who had come to the attention of police for acts of domestic violence against women, sexual violence against women and children.

If the proposed Barring system were in place at the time of Huntley's offences, the domestic violence which preceded his reported criminal acts against children would not have protected Holly Wells and Jessica Chapman from his employment at Soham Village College unless it involved acts of sexual violence. The dual register system means that even if acts of sexual violence against his partner were included, in all likelihood he would have been prohibited from working with vulnerable adults, but not children. If a single register which took account of all acts of serious violence had been in place, and correctly applied, there is a significantly higher chance that Huntley would have been apprehended.

For this reason we would echo the calls of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in strongly recommending that a single register of adults barred from working with vulnerable adults and children is created, with the lists of offences where representation is or is not allowed being redrawn and added to. The content we would recommend for these lists is included as Appendix lists 11 and 12.

'right to make representations' and 'no right to make representations'

If the recommendation for a single register is rejected Eaves recommends that the sub-sections regarding the right to make representations should be redrawn. Our recommendations are included as appendix lists 2 (children) and 6 (adults).

There are a number of offences which Eaves recommend should be moved from the list of offences 'with right to make representations' to the list of offences 'with no right to make representations'.

Where there is a possibility that extenuating circumstances may reduce culpability for an offence we have placed it on the list of offences 'with right to make representations', for example infanticide may have been committed by a young girl who did not know she was pregnant and panicked when she gave birth.

If there is no possibility of extenuating circumstances and/or research has shown a significant likelihood of re-offending then we have placed offences on the list 'with no right to make representations'. For example rape of an adult or child.

Charges of rape are often downgraded to sexual assault or sexual assault by penetration if it is difficult to prove the rape in a court of law. Therefore men charged with this offence should not have the right to make representations.

Likewise, men who attack women who are able to fight off their attacker may be charged with sexual assault because they were unable to complete the rape. This does not mean they are any less dangerous, and as such they should not have the right to make representations.

It is also important to note that the majority of children and adult victims of sexual offences do not report the attacks they experience. This potentially means that by the time a sexual offender comes to the notice of authorities he may have committed a number of other attacks.

Additional offences to be included on a single or dual register

Regardless of the chosen structure there are a number of additional offences we would like to add to the list 'barred with right to make representations'.

Rape of an adult under section 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 is not included in the lists of barring offences against adults (page 26 of the consultation only specifies rape [of a child]). This should be added as an offence with no right to make representations.

The Home Office and police in seven cities across the UK launched a campaign against kerb crawling earlier this year. We would recommend that kerb crawling is included as an offence with right to make representations demonstrating a joined up approach to this issue.

Many violent offences are not included in the list of proposed offences which would bar people from working with children or vulnerable adults. There are recognised overlaps between domestic violence and child sexual and physical abuse (Mullender, 2000) and between domestic violence and other criminal activity. We feel strongly that those convicted of acts of serious violence, including domestic violence, are not suitable to work with vulnerable adults or children.

Offences to be removed from a single or dual register

The current lists of offences mean that gay men who took part in consensual, adult, group sex activities (deemed to be 'in public' because more than 2 people were present) before 2003 could be criminalised.

Schedule 4 of the SOA 2003 gave leave to apply for notification requirements to be abolished for men convicted under section 12 or 13 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 (c. 69) (buggery or indecency between men), or section 61 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 (c. 100) or section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885 (c. 69) (corresponding Northern Ireland offences). There is little reason why 'offences' which no longer have notification requirements attached should still be included in barring lists. We would recommend that these offences are removed from the barring lists. Offences in this category are detailed in appendix list 8.
